Defining the priets of productivity

In the context of the macroeconomic environment, the sophistication of company operations and strategy depends on three broad factors: the macroeconomic context, the political, legal and macroeconomic business environment, and the competitive environment. These factors—along with customers, and the availability of resources—interact to determine a company’s competitiveness.

The macroeconomic context, or the political, legal, and macroeconomic business environment, is the environment within which companies operate and compete. The macroeconomic context consists of the macroeconomic factors that influence company operations and strategy, such as taxes, exchange rates, and government spending. The political, legal, and macroeconomic business environment consists of the political and legal factors that influence company operations and strategy, such as the political and legal environment within which companies operate and compete.

The competitive environment consists of the industry environment within which companies compete. The competitive environment consists of the industry environment within which companies compete, such as the industry environment within which companies compete and the industry environment within which companies compete.

In Part of the Canadian Competition series, Roger Martin, Dean of the Rotman School of Management at the University of Toronto, argues that Canadian companies are not only competitive but also competitive in global markets. “Too many Canadian firms begin their journey with little understanding of the opportunities and threats that could face them in the global market,” he writes. “It is the national environment that determines whether Canadian firms can not only succeed but also compete in global markets.”
